On November 2, 2005 a Child and Youth Review Panel was appointed to examine the province's system of oversight, public reporting and advocacy with respect to the protection of children and youth. The Panel was appointed to address increasing public concern that children's deaths in the province were not being properly investigated or publicly reported. The deaths of Sherry Charlie and Savannah Brianna Marie Hall, in particular, brought back memories of the death of Matthew Vaudreuil, whose death had resulted in the 1994 Gove Inquiry into Child Protection. As recommended by Judge Thomas Gove, the Inquiry had resulted in the appointment of a permanent Children's Commissioner, as well as a permanent Child, Family and Youth Advocate. Both of these Officers were independent and reported directly to the Legislative Assembly. In 2002 both the Office of the Child, Youth and Family Advocate and the Children's Commission were dissolved and their functions were absorbed by the provincial Coroner's Service and the newly formed Office for Children and Youth (also known as the British Columbia Child and Youth Officer), reporting to the Attorney General. This Panel was struck to review the effectiveness of this new structure and to recommend improvements. The Commission chair was Ted Hughes, a former Saskatchewan judge who has served as Conflict of Interest Commissioner in British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and was the Chief Adjudicator with respect to settlement of Indian Residential School claims. The other commissioners were: Jane Morley, a lawyer and mediator, who was serving as the British Columbia Child and Youth Officer; Joyce Preston, who served as the Province's Child, Youth and Family Advocate from 1995 to 2001; Tl'azt'en Nation Grand Chief Ed John, a former British Columbia Minister for Children and Families and former law professor who has served six terms on the First Nations Summit political executive; Terry Smith, the provincial Chief Coroner, who was responsible for the independent review of all reportable children's deaths in the province; and Maureen Nicholls, a former commissioner of the Public Service Employee Relations Commission, chair of the Workers' Compensation Board and a former deputy minister. The Honourable Judge Thomas Gove, Commissioner for the 1994 Gove Inquiry into Child Protection, was to be available to provide advice and participate in a consultative process.

The Panel's terms of reference were divided into two parts. For Part 1 the Panel was to examine the system for the review of deaths of children, including the way results of reviews were publicly reported and internally addressed, and was to recommend improvements. For Part 2 the Panel was to examine the roles and responsibilities of the Ministry of Children and Family Development, the Child and Youth Officer, the Chief Coroner, the Ombudsman, the Public Guardian and Trustee as they related to advocacy for children and youth. The Panel was to investigate the roles and responsibilities these institutions had in monitoring and public reporting on the Government's performance in protecting and providing services for children and youth in British Columbia. Improvements were to be recommended. This final report was due by January 31, 2006. Controversy arose surrounding the discovery that the deaths of 713 children had not been properly investigated after the Government dissolved the British Columbia Children's Commission in 2002. On November 18, 2005 the original six-member panel was reconstituted with Ted Hughes as its single member. He was to consult with and seek the expert advice of the other five previously announced panel members mentioned above. The Honourable Thomas Gove would remain available to provide advice and participate in a consultative process. On November 30, 2005 the terms of reference and reporting dates were revised.

On April 7, 2006 Hughes released his final report. Six supplementary reports were released in the months following. My strongest impression from this review is one of a child welfare system buffeted by an unmanageable degree of change", said Hughes. The need for equilibrium and stability is a central theme of my report. (News release: Hughes calls for stability in B.C. child protection, April 7, 2006). He continued: A revolving door in senior leadership positions, major shifts in practice, functions and processes, and significant funding cuts have created a climate of instability and confusion that has only detracted from the Ministry of Children and Families' work on behalf of children". Hughes called for the appointment of a new, independent body to oversee the child welfare system. The Representative for Children and Youth would be appointed as an Officer of the Legislative Assembly for a five-year term, and report to an all-party standing committee. A Special Committee to Appoint a Representative for Children and Youth was struck in response to Hughes recommendations.

Hughes noted the ever-increasing numbers of aboriginal children being taken into care. The child welfare system must find better ways of responding to the needs of the aboriginal community and the aboriginal delegated agencies urgently required better training, equipment and office support. Hughes recommended the Government commit itself to a decentralized child welfare system, which means supporting it with adequate resources, time, a dedicated team, and budget stabilization". (Report, p. 149). On November 22, 2006 the Province's first Representative for Children and Youth, Mary Ellen Turpel-Lafond, was appointed under the new Representative for Children and Youth Act (S.B.C. 2006, c. 29). After fulfilling an interim role as the Child and Youth Officer, Turpel-Lafond assumed her full responsibilities as the Representative for Children and Youth on April 1, 2007.
